Until now, Europe was the West, Europe provided its best intellectuals, Europe shaped the discourse of world affairs, Europe was the inspiration for people from the US and also from Asia. Yet, it seems to me that Europe is the "sick man of the world", becoming each day less relevant in an age of Great Powers and becoming something more like a fancy amusement park for rich tourists coming from Asia. Now, the US is the sole giant which claims to be the leader of the "WEST," or is it? I am cautious about the rise of India. I think they face a lot of domestic challenges as the world gets more digitised and automated. Maybe it's because I was watching Andrew Yang's presidential campaign a few days ago, but the future dislocation of jobs thanks to technology is immense. From the old world to the new, and back -- A very brief history of European integration -- The European Union as an economic superpower -- The European Union as a geopolitical superpower -- The European Union as a cultural superpower -- Dealing with the European Union -- Lobbying the European Union -- Conclusion: a new chapter? -- Appendix I: The European Union institutions -- Appendix II: A personal tour of the European Union member states. Addeddate. 2010-11-29 20:05:22. The United States continues to see China as its primary rival. The fact that China, contrary to the expectations of many, managed to take control of the epidemic quickly, only increases the fears of Beijing among the American ruling class. China's struggle against coronavirus has demonstrated the effectiveness of its party-government system, its society's ability to mobilize amid crises, and its technological potential. Coronavirus has demonstrated not only the vulnerabilities of modern China but also its strong points. In competing with the United States, China will turn into a military superpower, and Russia, due to its comparatively limited economic, scientific, and technological resources, will increasingly lag.
